Fundamental principle behind the absolute advantage is that each country has a comparative advantage in producing a specific good. This is determined by the opportunity costs of producing that good relative to other goods. In the classic example, Portugal has an absolute advantage in wine production, while England has an absolute advantage in cloth production. However, Portugal has a comparative advantage in wine, and England has a comparative advantage in cloth. This is because Portugal's opportunity cost of producing wine is lower than England's, and England's opportunity cost of producing cloth is lower than Portugal's. Trade allows both countries to specialize in their comparative advantage and then trade for the other good, resulting in a higher standard of living for both. The concept of comparative advantage is a key principle in international trade theory, and it explains why countries trade even when one country has an absolute advantage in all goods. The absolute advantage is a special case of comparative advantage, where one country has a lower opportunity cost in producing a specific good than any other country. In the case of Portugal and England, Portugal has an absolute advantage in wine, but England has a comparative advantage in cloth. This is because Portugal's opportunity cost of producing wine is lower than England's, and England's opportunity cost of producing cloth is lower than Portugal's. Trade allows both countries to specialize in their comparative advantage and then trade for the other good, resulting in a higher standard of living for both. The concept of comparative advantage is a key principle in international trade theory, and it explains why countries trade even when one country has an absolute advantage in all goods.
